Research Interests

My areas of specialisation are applied microeconomics and quantitative development economics. My current research work focuses in the microeconomic analysis of the impact of violent socio-political conflict on household welfare. Other research work includes the measurement of non-monetary (education, health and political) dimensions of inequality and their effects on social development and economic growth, the measurement and modelling of poverty (static and dynamic), the relationship between poverty, income and non-income inequality and economic growth, the role of social security and redistribution on economic growth and welfare in developing countries and the impact of trade liberalisation and trade reforms on household income mobility in developing countries.
